

Lure of the Magic Box

Jimmie Holman & Paul Dorneanu

The lure of the "magic box" can be overwhelming, especially after many years of failed allopathic treatment. If previous reliance on conventional methods and systems had worked, the seeker would very likely not be searching for alternative solutions. Too many folks are experiencing the dismal failure of conventional medical treatments to successfully address their personal health challenges. More frequently than not, those conventional treatments come with their own set of NEW adverse effects and long term issues to be monitored and addressed, often placing the patient into a deteriorating spiral of degeneration and hopelessness.

We hear about this scenario almost DAILY. This has unfortunately become the norm for western medicine. As you watch TV and the smiling faces on the next pharmaceutical commercial, be sure to listen to and read (if possible) ALL the side effect notices and warnings. Would these actors really be smiling if they were confronted with these FACTS?

Exhausted, disillusioned, and physically spent, it is no wonder folks often come to alternatives simply looking for a "magic box" cure for their situation. Having often already lost the ability to think clearly or logically because of prolonged ill-health, their feelings of desperation and hopelessness are understandable, but also the direction they are now turning. By this point, folks or their family are willing to "try anything" to repair a seemingly, now-hopeless situation.

Dangers of the Magic Box

As most "lures" are meant to seem an attractive, yet deceptive solution to the subject's needs, typically it is all too often about "catching the target". For instance, a fish may be more attracted to one lure over another, one may be a nicer color, more realistic, better smell... But its design was always about "catching the fish" ...never about satisfying the fish's needs. The benefit was to the one with the lure, NOT the fish! Unfortunately, the marketplace has become one far more focused on the "lure" rather than the "suggested" results!

The dangers of the "lure" are further complicated. When it comes to alternative instruments, when the user or family comes with the diminished and desperate mindset, the lure often comes from an indirect or unscrupulous seller, (often NOT the manufacturer), promising or suggestion precisely what the person "wants" to hear offering no validation or technical explanation. In essence they are selling a "magic box"... a simple solution ... precisely what the person in their diminished state wants to hear. Multi-Level Marketing (MLM) schemes are notorious for this. Just as in the fish's lure, more effort is often spent in the marketing and catching the fish, than addressing the fish's personal expectation and needs. Like the fish, the buyer's results will likely NOT be what was expected.

We personally hear about this situation almost daily ... often from folks that have already been trapped by the lure once or twice in their "learning" experience. Without considering a strategic change in their path, they are likely doomed to failure once again. We understand this and often refuse to sell to the person simply looking still for that magic box ... for without that change in mindset or the assisted guidance and instruction, they too, even with the very best of equipment will again fail.

A TOOL in the Arsenal

On Matters of Health, (an earlier blog article available at the PulsedTechResearch.com website), attempted to describe this observed mindset the searcher might have and strongly suggests "taking matters of one's own health into their own hands". By attempting to better understand what is often a very personal and private situation, the person, ideally guided by a practitioner, will examine their situation from a logical perspective to help devise a strategy and route back to health and wellness. The practitioner supplements the information and experience the client lacks in their diminished state to help identify not only the goal but the recommended path to get their goal as well. The skilled practitioner acts, in many ways, not only as the contracted advisor, but also as an experienced educator for paths and instruments to use in that strategic trek to recovery.

These alternative instruments and complementing supplements then, should rather be considered no more than simple technical tools to help bring about the desired condition. It might also be considered a carefully selected WEAPON to utilize in your lifelong BATTLE for Health and Wellness! You of course would want to invest in the best you could acquire.
